The Capitalist Imperative Territory Technology

This book demonstrates that under capitalism, the process central to growth is geographical industrialization, and that the creation and use of territory is fundamental to economic development. In doing so, they make new contributions to the study of growth theory, industrial economics, technological change, industrial organization, labour market, urban and regional development, and theoretical human geography.

Richard Walker's research covers a broad range of fields in human geography. Walker is well known for his work in economic geography, especially The Capitalist Imperative: Territory, Technology and Industrial Growth (Blackwell, 1989), one of the most cited books in the field. His work as an urban geographer stretches from a dissertation and early articles on suburbanization through essays on the urban landscape to recent debates over the origins of cities and global urbanization.

Richard A Walker | Geography

storper is a marxist, so you know how the story is told (very academically) and how it ends (capitalism contains inexplicable contradictions, when will it end?). but don't avoid this book for those reasons. it is a refutation of most urban economic (and location) theory, positing that industry drives location. his points are well made and taken. i give three stars for the readability not the ...
